Context

Accreditation is a voluntary system of quality assurance based on peer review. Accreditation provides external validation of the integrity and quality of IWU's academic programs, in the case of disciplinary accreditation, and validation of institutional systems and processes in the case of institutional accreditation. Accreditation ensures that IWU is following good practice as understood by the larger higher education community.

IWU as an institution is accredited by the Higher Learning Commission, recognized by the U.S. Department of Education as a gate keeper for participation in Title IV federal financial aid.

The Accreditation Landscape

Regional accreditation dates from the late 1800's when colleges began to band together to hold one another accountable to best practice and to certify institutional integrity through the establishment of accreditation standards. Eventually, seven such associations covered the regions of the United States, hence the term "regional accreditation." Trade schools tended to gather by academic focus rather than geography, leading to the development of "national" accrediting agencies in parallel to the regional accrediting agencies. Recently, the Department of Education has removed the regional restrictions on the regional accreditors, setting them free to determine their own geographical scope of operations. There is no longer a distinction between the "regional" and "national" accrediting agencies and the Department of Education expects all of the agencies to be in competition with one another to the extent permitted by their individual missions. This is a significant change for the formerly regional agencies which historically pursued cooperation rather than competition. This cooperation continues in careful moderation through the now-inappropriately-named Council of Regional Accrediting Commissions.

Accreditation was independent of governmental regulation until the 1950's when GI Bill federal financial aid eligibility was linked to accreditation. Since that time, federal financial aid has become more and more prevalent, as has federal influence over accreditors and schools.

Accrediting agencies are held accountable in at least two ways. The first, as mentioned above, is through federal recognition. To serve as a gate keeper for participation in federal financial aid programs, an accreditor must apply for recognition by the U.S. Department of Education. Applicant accreditors are reviewed by the National Advisory Committee on Institutional Quality and Integrity (NACIQI). Recognized accreditors are also reviewed by NACIQI on a regular basis. The second accountability mechanism for accreditors is recognition by the Council for Higher Education Accreditation (CHEA). CHEA recognition is not required for Department of Education recognition, but both mechanisms serve to assure the integrity and value of the accreditation granted to schools and programs.

CHEA – Council for Higher Education Accreditation
<https://www.chea.org/>

CHEA is a private organization that recognizes accrediting agencies that fulfill a basic set of requirements for rigor and quality. Just as there are diploma mills that sell meaningless credentials, there are accreditation mills that peddle meaningless accreditations - being listed with CHEA certifies that an accrediting agency is legitimate and of reliable quality. Accrediting agencies are also certified by the US Department of Education if they serve as gate keepers for Title IV federal financial aid, so there are several high quality accrediting agencies that are not registered with CHEA, but many accreditors, such as the Higher Learning Commission, that are recognized both by CHEA and the Department of Education.
